The Kentucky Law Journal, founded and fostered by Judges Laferty and Chalkley in 1912, for the purpose of creating an educational co-operative medium in which the lawyers and students of law in Kentucky might discuss controverted legal topics, begins with this issue the fourth year of its life.

The outlook for the year is promising. A commodious office, well furnished, has been provided on the west side of the library, and with the articles already received and those promised from many of the leading law writers of the State, our Journal bids fair to rank before the end of the year with the best law reviews of the country.

We can do this only with the assistance of the able bar of Kentucky. We believe the Kentucky Law Journal, edited and published in our own State University, should logically be the medium for the expression of legal thoughts in our State.

We look to the Alumni of our department for the same loyal support they have given in the past. They owe to their Alma Mater in which they have acquired the foundation of their legal education both financial and contributory support.

We, the staff, are resolved to put forth our greatest efforts to advance the interests of the Law College of the University of Kentucky and to increase the reading value of the Journal to the legal profession of our State which it seeks to serve.
